You're at Belle Isle and you're alone. It's late August and there's finally a break in the humidity so you dashed to Belle Isle for solo reflection-on-summer time. You're staring into the little murky stream at the end of Main Beach, gazing into the ripple flow. Another beautiful Detroit summer is passing us by. You're feeling saturated in gratitude of the warmth, soaking in the sun on your skin. You reach down to scoop some water and anoint your neck, feeling the water drip underneath your top, sensing goosebumps forming on your back. Fast forward to The Now, well into Autumn and we're wearing much more clothes. Switching over wardrobes, saying goodbye to our summer clothes for now. In our summer clothes we saw fireworks, channeled a favorite character in a movie, drank delectable beverages with friends and saw the sun set. Gratitude is medicine, please give yourself a moment to feel grateful for your summer armor. We live in a material world, and we are material girls; how lucky are we to adorn our flesh vessels. Seeing as we are capable of infusing magic into our own lives, if we wear our garments with joy then that joy is shared. Looking forward, how can you summon gratitude for your daily garb?
